After the tragic finale of season three, Igor Sokolovsky has hit rock bottom. He has experienced betrayal, infidelity, unrequited love, and has once again fallen into the trap of having to save either those closest to him or himself. Igor ends up in prison. Then a stranger offers him a deal: his sentence will be annulled if the Silver Spoon carries out one secret task. As he is being transferred to solitary confinement, Igor flees...He realizes his newfound freedom will last no more than a few days. The police are after him, along with Valera, his long-time rival in the department, so Igor is forced to act quickly, harshly and ruthlessly. He finds the original drug suppliers: the elite gallery owners of Moscow who provide the high society of the capital with drugs. But this is only one step. His real target is Mei, a sexy, strong-willed Korean woman. She is the only person who knows the unique formula for "crystal". Constantly walking a fine line between life and death, Igor is forced to look into the very depths of his soul. It is hard for him, fighting alone for his friends' freedom, but he has no right to drag them into these dramatic events. His only emotional outlet is Zoya, but she is the wife of his former friend, who is the main distributor of "crystal." Igor needs only one thing: to make the right decision.

What is to be a child to whom parents ask the same question every day: whom does he love more? Mom or dad? What should mom do if she madly loves her son, but circumstances force him to take the child away from his father? What should be done to dad if his son is taken to America forever, and he cannot imagine his life without him? This is a story of choice. When deciding for a child, a parent often does as he is comfortable with. The child agrees, afraid to hurt the parent, but time will pass, he will mature and at some point he will decide for himself. Only the parent from this will be much more painful.

In the middle of the action is Lev Garin: a charismatic attractive, corrupt customs officer. “Bad guy” according to generally accepted concepts but “good guy” within the framework of a specific intrigue. The story begins with a high-profile crime: big businessman Platon and his wife Ariadna, who was also Lev’s lover, have disappeared without a trace. Lev is facing a choice: either negotiate with the blackmailers and jeopardize his career - or jeopardize Ariadne’s life. As events unfold, the love affair of Ariadne and Lev appears to be not just a trap, but an abyss into which his life constantly seems to fall. With little hope of saving himself, but desperate to try and find a way to save his family, Lev attempts to understand who and why is carrying out this persistent, and twisted game of revenge.

No one in their home even remembers Vera, the girls' mother. It's as if she never existed. The eldest daughter, Zhenya, believes her mother left them for her lover; the second daughter, Lika, hardly remembers her mother; and the youngest, Masha, doesn't remember her at all. Andrey then discovers he is terminally ill. He has only months to live, and realizes that there is a great deal he has not had time to achieve, and that after his death there will be no one to protect his girls. Andrey has to find a mother for his children while he still has time. Could Katya, the woman he loves, fill that role? Or perhaps his ex-wife, Vera, whom he threw out for her infidelity, but was never able to forget? Andrey tries to rebuild his family and asks Vera to marry him again. But can they be happy after all that's happened in the past? After all, he himself was dishonest with Vera from the very beginning. Every action, every step, every wrong decision compounds his dilemma. Can they avoid the consequences of their actions? Make amends and let bygones be bygones?
